Dovecotes in England:

An Introduction and Gazetteer

by

M.J.A. BEACHAM

A full country-wide survey of England's dovecotes is long overdue. Such a study may provide answers to several basic questions: how did dovecotes develop in England, at whose instigation, and when? Investigation of plan-types, nesting arrangements and other structural details may have an important bearing on these and other questions. Like many old buildings whose original use has gone, dovecotes in many places face a future which is uncertain. Their survival is often dependent upon local enthusiasts.

DEFINITION

Various names have been used indiscriminately for the buildings which formerly housed pigeons bred for the table: dovecot(e), columbarium, pigeon-house, pigeon-loft, even the medieval culverhouse. These breeding-houses fall naturally into two separate groups: those which are free-standing structures, and those which form a part of another building whose main purpose was other than the rearing of pigeons—such as a barn, or a church tower. It is proposed that the first group be termed Dovecotes, and the second Columbaria. This preliminary study is concerned with dovecotes only, and its accompanying gazetteer is restricted to the counties of England.

PURPOSE OF THE STUDY

The last attempt at a national study of dovecotes, by A.O. Cooke in 1920, only—as he admitted—skimmed the surface of the subject.¹ It relates only to then extant examples, apart from Bosbury; not all counties are covered, and many have only two or three examples. A recent regional study by J. Severn gives bare details of some half-dozen, followed by a list of sixty other sites for which he gives the location only.² Using material published over the past one hundred years, including the late Professor Pevsner's indispensable Buildings of England, which is, however, strong on location and short on detail, this present work is intended as the first step in a complete survey of dovecote sites. The gazetteer will serve as both a basis and, it is hoped, a practical stimulus for further studies. Eventually a full description and history of all known dovecotes and former sites will be compiled, with a status report on those

Mr. Beacham is an amateur historian currently undertaking a survey of reputed tithe barns (vol. I published 1987, vol. II due autumn 1989); he is also preparing a calendar of glebe terriers for publication by the Somerset Record Society.

extant concerning their current condition and prospects of survival. It is also hoped that a photographic record of each can be made and maintained for future workers in this area of vernacular architecture.

HISTORY

Pigeons provided three important things: eggs, meat and guano. In times when sufficient cattle could not be fed through the winter, a large variety of birds was eaten as a welcome alternative to salted meat.

Dovecotes are known in the east from Biblical times. They found their way to Britain either with the Romans, who built them extensively in Italy, or much later with the Normans. If the Romans introduced dovecotes nothing of their work survives. However, C.D. Chambers, in the early nineteen-twenties,³ after deciding from known medieval remains what kind of foundations would be likely contenders, claimed to have identified from archaeological excavations three circular buildings which may have been dovecotes (at Hayling Island, Corbridge, and Silchester) and two octagonal dovecotes, at Great Whitcombe and Stroud. Since then little seems to have been done to extend Chambers's findings. This is all the more regrettable since, in 1947, Hornell pointed out that the great impetus for dovecote building came not from the Normans but from lords returning from the Crusades.⁴ It certainly appears that the earliest surviving dovecotes can be dated to the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries.

Whereas in Italy anyone might erect a dovecote, in France and England it was a jealously-guarded seigneurial privilege. Many manor houses retain at least the remains of their dovecotes, as do some older rectories and vicarages. In spite of this restriction of ownership, by the mid seventeenth century there were an estimated 26,000 dovecotes in England alone. This profusion was, and still is, reflected in the various street names (le Culver Close, Bristol, 1540, now called Culver Street), field names (Dufhousefeld, Layer Marney, Essex, 1331) and names of farms (Pigeonhouse Farm, Weston Beggard, H/Worc, 16th cent.).

With the advent of the turnip and other root vegetables for winter feeding of cattle in the eighteenth century, the practice of slaughtering and salting down meat was rendered unnecessary, as was the need to keep pigeons for the table. No more dovecotes were built after the early nineteenth century, except for Baring-Gould's monstrous example at Lewtrenchard. Some have thought the decline in dovecotes to have been accentuated by the decay of the medieval manorial system and the movement away from a life regulated by custom or by the lord's will. Landowners probably became progressively more reluctant to maintain flocks of pigeons in the face of continual and vociferous protest from those whose corn was eaten each year by the manorial pigeons whilst they themselves were forced to net woodcocks in a local glade, the origin of the many 'Cockshut Woods'.

CONSTRUCTION AND DATING

The earliest surviving dovecotes seem usually to be circular in plan: 'seem' because, when it comes to dating these buildings, never has the overworked generalization medieval covered such a lack of definite information. Although dovecotes and their produce and profits are mentioned in monastic account rolls at an early date, little is noted regarding physical description or exact location. Like windmills, several successive dovecotes might occupy the same site, making positive identification very difficult.

Dating many early buildings, particularly such overtly vernacular ones as dovecotes, is all too often subjective. Materials for construction were invariably local (Figs 1–4). Plan-type, however, varies with date. Before about 1400, seventy-five per cent of currently known dovecotes were circular in plan (Figs 5 and 6). Between 1400 and 1650, although circular examples are still found, there is a preponderance of square and rectangular plans. From 1650 to 1800, rectangular and octagonal plans are the norm (Figs 7 and 8). Roof-type is influenced by plan. Square dovecotes have mostly pyramidal roofs, although some hipped and ridge types are found; circular and octagonal ones have conical roofs. Earlier examples had stone slate roofs, later ones, except in the Cotswolds, had tiles; a few were thatched.

Nest holes, arranged in tiers around the internal walls were either of stone, clay, chalk, or occasionally of wood. Two shapes predominated: L-shaped and oblong (Figs. 9 and 10). Both are found throughout the dovecote timescale. According to Cooke the earlier the dovecote, the more likely it is to be circular in plan, with walls as much as four feet thick, a domed roof, and a small access door for collecting the eggs, cleaning out, and so on.⁵ It also seems likely, from some apparently early examples, that the 'traditional' arrangement of a centrally-pivoted ladder (or potence) to enable the tiers of nest holes to be reached was a later introduction. It is, in fact, rather puzzling that, according to the O.E.D. the term potence first appeared in this context as late as 1887, in an article in the Journal of the Royal Archaeological Institute, vol. XLIV, p. 112. This is the only step in the development of dovecotes, which otherwise seem to have emerged 'fully-fledged'. Those few with a bathing basin in the centre of the floor, and possibly a simple hole in the roof by which the birds entered and left, are probably the earliest in date. This point is, however, uncertain.

PRESERVATION

The size of the average dovecote is both an advantage and a disadvantage. It is small enough for the cost of repair work or restoration to be relatively low. Set against this advantage is the fact that few members of the public wish to travel miles just to look at a dovecote, especially as very few still serve their original purpose. Dovecotes in the best state of preservation are those belonging to great houses and manor houses. They form part of the ensemble of the great country house that visitors have travelled to see, and they survive because owners see them as part of the whole and maintain them as such. Some of these are found on estates administered by the National Trust, and their future seems assured. Some have been converted to other uses. Larger examples have become cottages, smaller ones have been turned into stores. They have at least been preserved as buildings. Unfortunately many dovecotes have become derelict, and either eventually collapse or are swept away as land is sold for development. Rectorial and vicarial dovecotes seem to have suffered particularly in this respect: the several periods of incumbent resettlement have led to devastation of parsonage dovecotes. Why should they be preserved when much bigger buildings desperately need time and money spent on them and can guarantee a bigger return from tourism? A dovecote in good repair, with its nest boxes intact (and a few are still used, although usually by wild birds) is compact enough for a visitor to relate to in a very short time. The dovecote illustrates the social, economic, and dietary problems faced by all—by peer and peasant alike—until the late eighteenth century. Such problems and their solutions are better appreciated when one stands inside a dovecote, built by the same craftsmen who built the great abbeys and houses, than by reading of them or looking at photographs of buildings long ago demolished.

NOTE

It must be stressed that some of the dovecotes listed above may not still be extant. The Ancient Monuments Society's Newsletter over the past twelve months has included applications to demolish the following examples:

H/Worcs: Pebworth (Manor Farm)—18th cent.

Yorks: Thurnscoe (Low Grange Farm)—17th cent.

Fortunately the dovecote at Haselor Hall (Staffs) was removed last year and re-erected at the Avoncroft Museum of Buildings.
